While livestock remains the critical anchor for most Maasai households, many are obtaining income from a variety of alternative sources. Unfortunately, income from wildlife/tourism, an option seen as most desirable by many because of its potential to provide economically and environmentally \"win-win\" situations, still benefits relatively few Maasai.

Staying Maasai? Livelihoods, Conservation and Development in East African Rangelands (Springer 2009), a book co-edited by Professor Katherine Homewood (UCL Anthropology), brings together thirty years of research on East Africa's iconic Maasai people. The contributing authors present arguments for significant changes in the region's policies affecting Maasailand - the Maasai heartland straddling the Kenya-Tanzania border - and its communities.
