The Aisles Have Eyes: How Retailers Track Your Shopping...

Joseph Turow's most recent book, The Aisles Have Eyes, brings to the foreground a much neglected topic in privacy scholarship: some of the ways in which retailers are using technologies for surveillance of shoppers who pass through their doors. As Turow remarks, once we understand both "how and why" commercial surveillance has become a key strategy for high street retailers (p. 3), we can engage constructively with the profound implications of data-driven marketing in the retail space:
